Partnership between the European Commission and the Council of Europe in the field of youth

CALL FOR PARTICIPANTS

Symposium on youth participation in a digitalised world

14-16 September 2015
Budapest, Hungary

Strasbourg 27/04/2015

Background:

The youth partnership between the European Commission and the Council of Europeⁱ in the field of youth, as agreed between its partner institutions, has developed a "think tank" function aimed at increasing the knowledge about the contexts and needs of young people in Europe as well as current and upcoming challenges they face. The knowledge produced supports activities of the EU-CoE youth partnership, the partner institutions and their relevant structures, and is disseminated to other relevant actors in the youth field.

This working priority is in line with the current political key priorities of the two partner institutionsⁱⁱ, namely,

- for the European Commission: creating more and equal opportunities for all young people and promoting social inclusion, citizenship, and participation of all young people in various aspects of society; fostering cross-sectorial cooperation through partnerships between different actors involved in delivering support to young people; further developing expertise and availability of examples of best practice in these areas; strengthening the evidence base of youth policy and sharing examples of good practice through mutual learning; understanding the challenges youth face and identifying their expectations towards policy-makers and providers of support services to young people.
- for the Council of Europe: fostering democratic innovation and participation as well as cultural diversity and intercultural dialogue in socially cohesive societies; providing democratic competences in education, youth and civil society; supporting and improving young people's access to social rights; empowering and protecting vulnerable groups and minorities; contributing to young people's autonomy and a better transition from education to working life and the labour market; developing youth policy responses to exclusion, discrimination and xenophobia, in particular in disadvantaged areas and for vulnerable groups.

Objectives under this working priority:

- To systematise, increase and disseminate the knowledge on and understanding of young people in Europe and beyond, with a focus on their participation and social inclusion
- To identify, analyse and present good examples of practice in youth work and youth policy relevant to these core themes
- To identify main challenges, draw conclusions and formulate recommendations, as well as to propose models of youth policy and youth work interventions
- To support the knowledge-based youth policy and practice through networking, dialogue and dissemination of knowledge and examples of good practice, including contributing to peer learning.

Youth participation has been largely addressed over the last 20 years and particularly in 2014 by the reflection group on youth participation organised by the EU-CoE youth partnershipⁱⁱⁱ.

This reflection group discussed a number of analytical papers, which led to policy recommendations. In addition, the findings of this work were compared to the results of the multilateral cooperation project on youth participation organised by the German National Agency for Erasmus+/Youth in Action, which led to the joined recommendations "Amplify participation of young people in Europe". In 2015 this work is to continue by focusing the reflection on participation and democratic governance in the digitalized world and the role of youth policy and youth work in this respect.

Purpose:

The EU-CoE youth partnership organises a symposium on youth participation in the digitalised world to answer questions coming from some recent events and activities, most prominently the World Forum for Democracy, November 2014 in Strasbourg, the Council of Europe No Hate Speech Campaign, and the results of the study "Youth Participation in Democratic Life", published by the European Commission in 2013. Entering into a digitalised world including new ways of communication and educational approaches, different economic settings, political relationships and representative structures has a crucial impact on (democratic) societies and forms of governance. In the context of growing political and social extremism across Europe, challenging the existing democratic systems, the symposium will allow deepening the reflections on youth participation and the future of democracies in the digital era, on chances and risks stemming from these developments that young people are facing. It will evaluate the young people's needs and aspirations, identifiable tendencies and prognosis. Related policies and practice examples will be shared and discussed. Besides experts in the field of youth policy, representatives of related policy sectors such as child protection, cybercrime, digital agenda for Europe etc. will be invited.

An analytical paper will be elaborated by expert(s) to feed the reflections and discussions during the symposium. It will then be finalised following the event, taking into account its findings and conclusions. The key messages that it will contain will then be widely disseminated. A concise report of the symposium will also be produced.

The symposium will be the major event of the EU-CoE youth partnership in 2015 and organised in link with the annual meetings of the Pool of European Youth Researchers (PEYR) and the correspondents of the European Knowledge Centre for Youth Policy (EKCYC).

The concept of participation:

Participation of young people is to be understood as broad as possible. In the recommendations of the above-mentioned Reflection Group on Youth Participation it was reiterated that the forms and arenas of (youth) participation should be acknowledged and promoted in all their diversity, meaning old and new forms of participation, in both rural and urban settings, in daily and community life, in educational and work settings, in public spaces, youth care and welfare systems, in civil society, (sub-) cultures and as collective or individual expression across political, social, individual and virtual contexts.

Thus participation must be promoted for all youth, organised and non-organised, in cities and remote areas, regardless of gender and age, and with particular attention to 'virtually disconnected', disabled, disadvantaged, marginalised, disenfranchised youth, e.g. migrants, refugees, asylum seekers, youth in care systems...

Understanding participation is a pre-condition for further developing structures of democratic governance at all levels, be it local, regional, national or international. Voting on- or offline is only one element in representative democracies. "Open" participation in terms of power sharing / co-deciding, civic and social movements, direct democracy and even individual (and sometimes illegal) forms of participation, such as hacking, graffiti, body painting should also be considered.

As an example, the guidelines for e-participation by young people in decision-making at all levels, developed in a multilateral cooperation project of the International Youth Service of the Federal Republic of Germany in 2014, distinguish between two dimensions: direct, or transitive e-participation online means that political decisions are influenced directly and structural links to political decision-making processes are enabled; indirect, or intransitive forms of e-participation reach out to internet users and encourage them to support certain issues and positions and thus contribute to the development of political opinion.

The usage of social media and the Internet is a good example of opportunities that young people eagerly take (like in the Arab Spring and other social movements around the world) but also the threats that they often face. On the one hand side they allow expressing one's opinions easily, sharing ideas and organising quickly large number of like-minded people. On the other, they carry the risk of on-line hate speech, bullying and other sorts of crime as well as surveillance. There are also diverse other barriers to e-participation, which young people are facing.

Consequently, reflecting on youth participation and democratic governance it is not about how to bring young people to vote, but how to support them in becoming / being active, critical, autonomous citizens, aware of underlying democratic values.

These ideas and the draft programme including its four thematic areas (see next chapter) has been developed by a small expert group coming from diverse professional backgrounds; this expert group supports the reflections on content, methodology and experts / speakers to be invited throughout the process.

Symposium programme

The programme of the symposium will be built around four thematic areas that are crucial in relation to the participation of young people (and democratic governance) in the digital age:

- Communication: trends in information and communication technologies, (new) ways to communicate via social media and of getting informed, digital competencies, innovative communication for fostering participation and engagement, freedom of expression vs. control.

- Education: new ways to learn and teach, online / e-learning vs. face-to-face learning, individual vs. collective learning, learning to participate, digital literacy, the potential of democratic and participatory pedagogies, both in formal and non-formal settings, learning to be critical or adjusted citizens, future of citizenship education, open education resources.
- Economic sphere and working life: new ways of working, e.g. telework, new working relationships: individualisation vs. collective employees representation, flat hierarchies vs. vertical command structures, network structures and shared responsibilities, new forms of entrepreneurship, changing work spaces, new economic formats and methods like the crowdsourcing approach and using collective intelligence.
- Democracy and Political Participation: diverse forms of democracy: representative vs. direct democracies, open vs. repressive societies; local, regional, national and international levels of governance; role of civic and social movements, new forms of expression and engagement, protection of human rights, freedom of expression online, freedom of assembly and association online, perspectives of "Post-Democracy" and what comes after?

Discussions on these four areas will look from two perspectives: chances and opportunities and risks and threats for young people and follow the questions:

- Where do we stand today?
- What are the perspectives and visions?
