Young people engage in politics in a diversity of ways: voting, membership in political parties, youth organisations or formal structures, digital tools, artivism, protests, campaigns, youth movements and civil disobedience.

Through participation, young people learn how decision-making happens in practice and increase their competences; but stakeholders are also empowered in the process, benefiting from young people’s diverse and creative perspectives.

Young people advocate for open and pluralistic participation which can make their organisations, movements and societies more inclusive.

Young people increasingly critique the status quo using humour and irony with the help of social media and digital technologies, by creating memes and deepfake videos.

Democracy, diversity, respect, and human rights.

Young people also engage through different art forms – painting banners, graffiti, songs, flashmobs, theatre performances.
